SYNOPSIS

A street in downtown Warsaw, Poland. Arjun Talwar immigrated here a decade ago from India but still struggles to fit in. „Wolf Street” – or “Ulica Wilcza” – hasn’t made it easy for him. In an attempt to accelerate his integration, the director begins filming his neighbors, testing his relationships with them while seeking ways to overcome his own alienation.

With the help of his friend Mo, another immigrant-turned-filmmaker, Arjun uncovers the mysteries of the street, revealing a web of charming characters: a postman who, along with letters, delivers remedies for loneliness; an exile from Damascus building a replica of his hometown; and a wandering brass band, among many others. The director discovers that they are like himself—people who live between the past and the present, between an imagined homeland and a real one. The street, like an invisible thread, connects them all, offering solace against the melancholy of everyday life.

Within Wolf Street’s kilometer-long confines, an image of modern Europe emerges, exposing a kaleidoscope of contradictions and anxieties. The film throws stereotypes to the wind as it tries to navigate the fictitious boundaries between neighbours. Poland, often perceived as homogenous, unwelcoming, and right-wing, is faced with a mirror held up by a foreigner-filmmaker who creates a witty and personal portrait of his adopted country.

Letters From Wolf Street will have its World Premiere at the upcoming edition of Berlinale - Berlin International Film Festival, in the Panorama section.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

When I first came to Poland in 2010, I found the country charming, but also experienced a cultural shock. Over time, I learned the language and adapted to life here. Yet, I could never truly call Poland home. Coming from India, a country that's really diverse, I couldn't relate to Poland's homogenous culture. What riled me most were the shouts of "Osama" and "Michael Jackson" that I heard while walking down the street.

Poland today has changed. There are more foreigners than ever, yet people from India, Georgia, and Vietnam remain absent from public discourse, even as they drive taxis and cook for the country's urban population. I feel the time is right to describe this place from an immigrant's perspective.

The film takes place on a single street in central Warsaw: Wolf Street, where I happen to live. It follows the lives of several characters who reside there. Their perspectives reveal the absurdities and essence of Polish life, creating a portrait of the society, whereas their evolving relationships with me turn the film into a self-portrait. In the backdrop are the events shaping the region today: the tensions between Europe's liberal and conservative forces, the war in Ukraine, as well as the lingering trauma of an incident from my past.

As Europe shifts to the right, distrust toward „the other” affects not only foreigners but the whole fabric of society. The film is a way of countering that tendency. Grappling with my own feelings of otherness, I reach out to other people—immigrants and Poles alike—who feel equally alienated in today's world. By creating a kind of “community of the street”, we find that getting by is a lot easier when you have company.

WHO'S WHO AT WOLF STREET

PIOTR CHADRYŚ

A quick-witted postman who, along with delivering letters, provides remedies for loneliness. He knows the street and its residents like no one else.

Arjun's friend from film school, originally from China. Mo assists with sound recording, while also dealing with many of the same doubts that plague Arjun: will she ever find her place here?

MO TAN

FERAS DABOUL

A resident of Wolf Street and an exile from Syria, he has lived in Poland for many years. Recently, he became a father and, while awaiting Polish citizenship, he tries to build a replica of his hometown.

KAZIMIERZ "OSKAR" PACZKOWSKI

A Polish Romani man who bonds with Arjun over their shared ancestry. The Roma people originate from India and represent a significant ethnic minority group in Poland.

BARBARA GOETTGENS

Arjun's therapist who spends much of their sessions analysing the Polish psyche.
